In my mind, the settlement is fair.

We don't need to punish one of our great companies just because they have a good product that no one else can compete with.

I have Linux on my machine also (dual system). Windows is far superior in every way. When Linux puts together a competitive product I'm sure they'll attract a good following as Windows has been able to do. Redhat and the others need to work harder at improving their product. The same goes for Netscape.

I believe it is sufficient to monitor Microsoft and insure that they don't attempt predatory practices, but punishing them for success is not acceptable.
